Sixth FORM

Sixth Form

The UK education system is respected worldwide, and A Levels are recognised by universities around the world. 6th Form or College is the stage before university.

The depth of study in Year 13 is equivalent to the first year of university. British children study for 13 years before progressing to university for typically 3 years whereas in other education systems, students spend 12 years studying before starting university for a minimum of 4 years.

There are no compulsory subjects in Year 12 and Year 13. British children who wish to progress to university specialise in Year 12 and 13 at the age of 16 in the 3 or 4 subjects according to their talents and career focus. BTEC and CTEC qualifications are coursework-based, recognised by universities worldwide, and can be taken on their own or combined with A Levels. They provide a more practical, real-world approach to learning alongside a theoretical background.

How does Sixth Form work?

In Years 12 and 13, students have a mix of classroom lessons and independent self-study, typically receiving 4 to 5 1/2 hours of classroom tuition per subject per week. They can choose from various subjects, with A Levels designed to develop critical thinking and independent study skills.

The timetable includes gaps designated for self-study, which students are expected to conduct at school, in the library, or at home. Typically, students are expected to undertake self-study.

While some parents or schools may expect a fuller timetable, we can request that a British State school adds an additional subject or extracurricular activity. However, it's important to note that school timetables are generally designed to accommodate no more than 3 or 4 subjects, and are subject to class size and availability.
